Not illustrated. 1884 Excerpt: . that the fault has been entirely condoned, and if there was ever a thought m the daughter s mind, that her mother might have dealt more generously in her outfitting, that too has been so far forgotten, that but for your own reference, it certainly should have had no mention here to-day. And now, without fear of a single frowning look, this daughter comes into this stately house, where she finds her mother s dwelling, far more luxuriously than in the old home from which she went out, and most heartily and sincerely extends her congratulations to her on this Centennial of her natal day. There is always something very sad and depressing in seeing our parents after the flesh grows old, because we cannot but associate with increasing years, failing strength and vigor; nor can we think of these, except as foretokens of that great change which shall remove them altogether from our sight, and put an end to all the precious joys of personal fellowship. But how different it is with a Church. God has provided, that when she has fulfilled, and still continues to fulfil her mission, by loyally holding up the standard of His truth before men, added years shall issue only in added vigor and increasing opportunities of usefulness. We have read with intense interest, the history of this our mother Church, as set forth in the eloquent words of her beloved pastor, and as we have marked the gracious...
