Excerpt: . . . was shown, notwithstanding the thoroughness of the reaction which had followed them, even to the works of Julian. Accordingly the Roman society possessed, in 430, two systems of law, and the barbarians found face to face, on the one hand ancient Paganism tempered by the philosophy of the jurisconsults themselves, acting, as we shall see, under Christian influences, and on the other Christianity tempered by the timidity of the emperors, who only embraced reforms already rough-hewn by their philosophic lawyers, and measured out carefully the blows they were bound to strike at the old institutions: here pagan law just gilded by the rising of Christianity--there the beginning of Christian jurisprudence still entangled in the last shades of the darkness from which the world was issuing. We must examine these two principles in order, and the result which they had brought about. We see, on opening the text-books of the classic...
