The part of Lord Carlton, played by Mr. John Hare, is another example of irrelevance. He is the most prominent male character in the play, and yet he has practically nothing to do with Mr. Barrie's idea. He ought, surely, to be one of the sufferers whom the girl doctor wishes to cure. As it is, he is simply a walking and talking gentleman, who asks her to marry him just before the curtain falls. Mr. Barrie is quite popular enough, quite sufficiently recognised as a sentimentalist, to have omitted that perfunctory touch of sentiment. After the roaring absurdities of the preceding scene, it can have imposed on nobody, and must have jarred on many people. The worst of it is that Lord Carlton might easily be...
